VOL. 2 : COLD WEATHER, COZY PLANTS

WHAT WINTER MEANS FOR YOUR GARDEN

Quiet gardens today lead to stronger growth tomorrow!

Even though gardens may look quiet after recent snow and extended below-freezing temperatures, winter weather plays an important role in protecting and preparing your soil for spring. Snow acts as a natural blanket, insulating plant roots and helping soil retain moisture while cold temperatures reduce pest and disease pressure.

Soil & snow protection

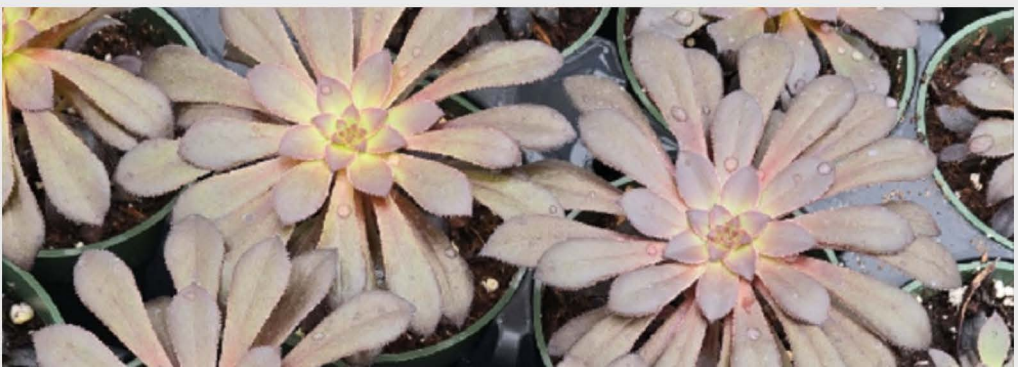

Snow cover helps prevent extreme temperature swings in the soil and protects perennial roots from freeze damage. As it melts, it slowly adds moisture back into the ground – a win for spring planting.

Plants in winter rest

Perennials and trees are safely dormant right now, storing energy for spring growth. Leaving plant debris and garden beds undisturbed provides insulation and supports beneficial insects through the winter.

What gardeners can do now

Avoid walking on frozen beds to prevent compaction, check stored bulbs and tools, and use this downtime to plan garden layouts and plant lists. Winter is the perfect season for preparation and dreaming up what's next.

SUCCULENTS THAT SHINE ALL WINTER LONG

Succulents are ideal indoor plants for the colder months, thriving in bright light and drier indoor air. Their low watering needs and bold shapes make them easy to care for while outdoor gardens rest, adding texture and life to sunny windowsills and cozy indoor spaces.

With endless variety in color, form, and size, succulents fit just about anywhere and work well on their own or grouped together. This spring, Canoyer will once again offer a wide selection of indoor plants and succulents, ready to help you bring fresh energy indoors and transition seamlessly into the growing season.
